

The New Cinephilia: Bill Bensley's Visual Storytelling

Bill Bensley is a renowned interior designer and architect known for his lavish and immersive designs that evoke a sense of place and time. His work has been featured in numerous publications, including Architectural Digest, The New York Times, and Wallpaper*. In recent years, Bensley has turned his attention to filmmaking, creating a new form of cinephilia that combines film, design, and storytelling.

Bensley's films are not traditional documentaries or narrative films. Instead, they are visual essays that explore the relationship between design, culture, and the human experience. His films are often set in exotic locations, and they feature interviews with local people, artists, and historians. Bensley's films are a unique blend of travelogue, documentary, and art film.

Bensley's films are part of a growing trend of "new cinephilia." This new wave of filmmaking is characterized by its focus on visual storytelling, its use of non-traditional formats, and its exploration of new and emerging technologies. New cinephilia filmmakers are often interested in creating immersive experiences that transport audiences to other worlds.
