The affair began in 1772 when King Louis XV ordered a magnificent diamond necklace for his mistress, Madame du Barry. The necklace was made by the jeweler Charles Auguste de Rohan, Prince of Soubise. However, du Barry was never to receive the necklace. In 1774, Louis XV died and was succeeded by his grandson, Louis XVI. Louis XVI and his wife, Marie Antoinette, were not as indulgent as Louis XV had been, and they refused to pay for the necklace.

In 1785, a woman named Jeanne de Valois-Saint-Rémy, who claimed to be the illegitimate daughter of Louis XV, approached Cardinal de Rohan, the Bishop of Strasbourg. Jeanne told Rohan that she had been authorized by the Queen to purchase the necklace on her behalf. Rohan, who was hoping to gain favor with the Queen, agreed to help Jeanne. He borrowed the money from a jeweler named Boehmer and gave it to Jeanne.

However, Jeanne had no intention of buying the necklace for the Queen. Instead, she and her accomplices sold the diamonds and pocketed the money. When Boehmer realized that he had been swindled, he went to the police. The police arrested Jeanne and her accomplices, and the scandal became public.

The Diamond Necklace Affair was a major embarrassment for the French monarchy. The public was outraged that the Queen had been involved in such a scandal, and they began to lose faith in the monarchy. The affair also weakened the position of Marie Antoinette, who was already unpopular with the French people. The Diamond Necklace Affair is often seen as a turning point in the history of France. It marked the beginning of the decline of the Bourbon monarchy and the rise of the French Revolution.

In 1785, Cardinal de Rohan purchased the necklace for Jeanne de Valois-Saint-Rémy, who claimed to be acting on behalf of the Queen. However, Jeanne sold the diamonds and pocketed the money.

The Trial

Jeanne was found guilty of fraud and sentenced to life in prison. Her accomplices were also found guilty and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.
